

Personal statement

I am Research fellow in Political Science at the University of Siena and Co-editor of the peer-reviewed journal European Political Science (Impact Factor 2.436).

My main research areas include territorial politics, electoral politics, public opinion and party politics. A central theme in most of my research is how the distribution of competencies and socio-economic resources across territories and levels of government influences both party strategies and public opinion.

I have extensive knowledge and expertise in social science research methods, with a focus on content analysis and survey research. I teach research design and quantitative methods, public opinion, survey and data analysis, design thinking and participatory processes. I have been lecturer at the Royal Holloway University of London in 2019.

Besides research and teaching, my academic profile has also been enhanced with project management and project writing skills. Working on several collaborative projects, I also gained significant experience on data management, open access, ethics, dissemination, and communication.

Research interests

Territorial politics • Decentralisation • Territorial inequalities • Spatial justice • Multilevel governance • Public opinion • Party politics • Solidarity • Sovereignism • Populism • Survey methods • Qualitative content analysis • Deliberative and Participatory processes • Delphi • Comparative Politics • Research transparency.
